What I did was that I used two plugins: 1. A frontend plugin that allows the editing of a default article 2. A backend plugin that would execute the query and extract the data from the DB, which is then written to an article. Both plugins use the same config file, thus the variables are written in the same file (i.e. global variables). The config file allows you to define a base template, which in this case, will be a base default theme. This example is for a default style, if you want to get a different style set a different theme: # Template: default_editor.
