Q: Is it possible to increase reliability in "make" by using ANSI C lint? I have a huge project (the code is over 6 years old so is not written from scratch) and I would like to catch and fix some errors from time to time. I also like to have some static analysis on my C source-code (no C++), so I think that it is better to have it done by automated tools. The problem is, at this moment, my tools list is full of errors and warnings. I think that is because I don't know which lint. I have the standard ANSI C lint, and also the static analysis tools from gcc, since my project is a GNU one. I know that static analysis tools are not easy to be automated, but I was wondering if there is a way of increasing the reliability in 'make' by combining both of them, so I won't spend time "looking for those lines" in the project.

A: I think lint is a great tool to keep your code clean. Also, I think you can put the lint output in your make file and possibly the static analysis tool can run it after the make (when the build will be successful). However, I would not say it is easy, as you will need to implement your own rules to lint and static analysis. So maybe it will help to write some rules? I hope I help.

A: It is very difficult to automatically get to a reliable outcome from a build process with static analysis. Unfortunately, there is no way to apply this kind of "semi-manual" audit to your code today. While it is very easy for us to get an external static analysis tool to stop us making a particular error, we still can't be sure that such tools are perfectly reliable. Humans aren't much better at catching errors in large, complex code bases than static analysis tools, or vice versa. If you can't be bothered to maintain and audit the entire codebase, the "obvious answer" is to use automated
